JOYOUS JUNK

STOP!!! Don't throw that fruit juice can away. Kendall School needs it!

Kendall's Art Department is making an effort to build up a supply of inexpensive, unusual and available art materials. What you may consider worthless is precisely what is needed: small boxes, packing materials, woodscraps, old hardware, plastic bags, etc.

Almost anything will do and will be used for printing, collages and constructions and hopefully will be the main source of materials for an experimental workshop.

Don't let your trash go to waste. Recycle it to the Kendall School Art Department.

STOP THIS!

GALLAUDET HAS MUCH TO PRESERVE

We are all probably aware of the prominent role Gallaudet College has played in the history of education of the deaf, but the College has also figured significantly in the architectural history of the United States.

As the College's first President, Edward Miner Gallaudet was concerned with the physical expansion of the campus. In 1865, he commissioned Frederick Law Olmsted to design a master plan for the 14 acres which had been purchased from Amos Kendall.

Hailed as the father of modern landscape design, Olmsted is noted for developing the plans for Central Park in New York and the National Capitol grounds, for example. As conceived by Olmsted, the campus was to follow the natural terrain of the land and to be an environment where man could find serenity within an urban setting.

Further the buildings on the campus would also be compatible with the environment. Many of the 19th Century buildings -- Chapel Hall, the Edward Miner Gallaudet Home and the Gatehouse, for example -- were designed by Withers and Vaux buildings are excellent examples of Victorian-Gothic architecture.

Chapel Hall, which was given the most prominent position on the grounds, was cited as a historic landmark in 1966 by the National Park Service. The original fourteen acres remain almost completely intact as designed by Olmsted. The College is presently awaiting final confirmation that this area of the campus has been designated as a Site for Historic Preservation.
